With over two decades of general commercial litigation experience in trial and appellate courts across the country, Tom focuses on large, complex, and high-stakes cases. Although his broad practice encompasses nearly all forms of contentious business disputes, Tom frequently advocates on behalf of operators and service companies in oil-and-gas litigation.

When royalties and other mineral interests are hotly contested, Tom is known for his thoughtful treatment—in the courtroom and on the papers—of the many intricacies that drive title controversies and deed-construction cases to successful conclusions. He represents clients in matters involving allegations of the underpayment and miscalculation of royalties; violations of continuous drilling and development obligations; and improper deductions for transportation, processing, and other post-production expenses. His diverse industry background also includes advising E&Ps and pipeline companies in mineral trespass and surface-use disputes, and in related proceedings for emergency and preliminary injunctive relief.

In addition, Tom often assists operators and oilfield service providers navigate disputes surrounding the breach of supply, service, and confidentiality agreements and the theft and misappropriation of trade secrets. When mineral owners are impossible to find, or when they finally emerge after long absences, he helps oil-and-gas companies establish, administer, and wind down mineral receiverships to ensure that time-sensitive operations are never impeded by missing or emerging interest owners. And, in the event business relationships sour, Tom has earned a reputation for diplomatically—and, when push comes to shove, aggressively—resolving disagreements among joint interest partners and other collaborators in the oil patch.

Tom brings to his practice both broad and deep practical experience in the energy sector, which encompasses helping clients with title issues, seismic-related disputes, drilling operations and surface damages, royalty underpayments, offset drilling and development, bad-faith pooling, cessation of production, and lease termination.

Beyond oil and gas, Tom has played a significant role in litigating and ultimately settling many nationwide class actions, including matters involving allegations of securities and consumer fraud at Big Four auditing and accounting firms and at a wide range of prominent publicly traded companies. He previously worked at a large New England law firm and a New York class-action boutique, where he gained a wealth of courtroom experience and faced off against tenacious litigators from some of the largest and best-known firms in the country.

Always operating with an eye toward the business objectives of his clients and their bottom lines, Tom makes it a top priority to formulate creative, cost-effective strategies for defusing his clients' legal problems outside the courtroom. In this way, he helps his clients avoid or abbreviate litigation, conserve resources, and preserve valuable business relationships.

Tom and his team are frequently told by judges, opposing counsel, and colleagues that their brief writing skills are exceptional, and Tom believes that they rank among those of the very best appellate practices in the country.

Every week, you can listen to Tom's podcast, available at www.energylawroundup.com, which is devoted exclusively to breaking legal news and developments in the energy industry.

Away from the Office

Outside of his practice, Tom reads extensively and stays in shape by running and playing tennis. He's also busy keeping up with his three kids and their activities.
